RICHMOND

Eleven humanities projects in Virginia have received grants from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

The National Endowment for the Humanities announced the grants Monday. The Virginia projects total nearly $2 million in funding.

The largest grant of more than $324,000 will fund a project at Old Dominion University to help researchers with archiving websites and navigating archived collections.

The Library of Virginia is getting more than $323,000 to digitize 100,000 pages of Virginia newspapers dating from 1836 to 1922.

The University of Mary Washington also will prepare papers of James Monroe with a grant of $290,000.

Virginia Tech, the University of Virginia, George Mason University, the College of William and Mary and the George C. Marshall Research Foundation also received grants.
